"What an assignment!" Joe Hardy grinned at his brother, Frank, as they arrived at Mr Wright's grand mansion on a cold night.

A few days earlier, their father, detective Fenton Hardy, had gone abroad with the inventor, Malcolm Wright, to recover his stolen antique plane. Before leaving, Mr Wright asked the Hardy brothers to retrieve his top-secret invention from his locked home before thieves could. Their father had warned that a gang was after it. Mr Wright had no time to secure it in a bank, so he hid it in his study.

As they scanned the entire area, the brothers worked out a plan on how to 'break in'—the best way was to climb a trellis to reach that one unlocked window that Mr Wright had told them about. Frank made his way up and sneaked in easily, but Joe who was shorter, struggled as he hung precariously on the window edge. "This isn't going to work," Frank groaned. "Climb back down and head to the back door." Without delay, Joe hurried down the trellis and headed there.

Once inside, they hurried to Mr Wright's study room. Searching the walnut desk, Joe found a hidden panel underneath and slid it open—but alas, it was empty. "Maybe it's not in here," he guessed as he examined it carefully. Just then, the boys heard the shattering of glass and immediately clicked off their flashlights. Someone must be after the same thing as them. Any minute, one or more men might mount the stairs and enter the room!

Panicking, the boys darted their eyes around. There were no curtains, large chairs or cupboards. "Yes, the panel!" Frank whispered. Quickly, the two crawled into it, pulled the desk and chair back into place, then closed it. The boys were holding their breaths when they heard the creak of the stairs as someone was climbing up.

Flashing their lights, the intruders stood at the doorway. A nasal-voiced man muttered, "I heard Wright mention a 'secret compartment'—maybe in here?" His partner nodded and both of them approached the desk slowly.

"God...please," Joe whispered, gripping his shirt tightly.
